I'm taking the package of both Stuart's and Pedro's behaviors and I'm going to escalate it with the dean to the provost and other UW-level authorities. I copied DanG as well. I'll keep everyone else posted.

I'm tired of the fact that UW rules are such that we can't actually do anything about this type of behavior.

Not many.

Course content should be related to the course -- extraneous political content is inappropriate and we can step in if it occurs. The "battle he wants to have" is to say that land acknowledgements are precisely that and, in his view, no syllabi should have them. But since they're recommended as an optional best practice, he wants to prove a point by putting in his own contradictory one. And here we are. He would gladly refuse to change it and/or write an article about how we was forced to change it.

Is this a battle to pick? Maybe.

 Are there rules about this kind of thing, or no?
